had hot water piped up to him from a restaurant that had been conducted in the theater basement, a beer spigot in the wall—you know they serve it in the theaters there—was converted into a hot-water faucet. We used a checking room for an operating ward, and entertained off an alcove of the floor for a dressing room for patients able to take some exercise. While I was there this unit handled from 500 to 600 cases, and we kept them only until they were in such condition that they could possibly be moved with safety, farther to the interior. It was a curious thing that I received quite unexpectedly an order to load a train with every patient we could possibly send away, and prepared to receive a new company from the front.

Supplies Needed Most.

"We realized early that there was no need so pressing as that for hospital supplies. Let me say right here that the most wonderful consignment of these was a box sent by the women's Red Cross auxiliary at Hartford, Conn. There were many things in it, but it was everything from surgical instruments to tooth powder. When it came, for instance, we had twenty-four boxes. This box had twenty-four. We kept twelve for our own use and sent the other twelve to the German hospital in the town with us, which likewise had no robes and greatly needed them. If that group of Hartford women could be given the contributions of charitable people to spend on Red Cross model boxes, there wouldn't be a dollar misplaced. They seemed to know exactly what was wanted.

"The greatest majority of the wounded we received were able to go back to the fighting line in five or six weeks; and they went back to the old conditions. Shrapnel wounds were most numerous, and after that rifle wounds. The shrapnel wounds are very bad, and fractures caused by them very ragged and hard to deal with. Of course, if we could get the wounded men immediately results to be much better, by the time they get to us, despite the excellent German system of first-aid on the field, infection would frequently have set in. Modern antiseptics, however, have very largely done away with that error of former wars, blood poisoning.

Germans Confident.

"The German people are profoundly certain their country is going to win the war. I had opportunity to get at the innermost thoughts of a great number of them—sick and wounded soldiers, their parents, brothers, sisters, wives, and there was no variation from that rule of absolute confidence in their cause or their success.

"There is little evidence to be seen in Germany that anything abnormal is afoot in the empire. Everybody is well fed, supplies are ample, bread tickets are distributed free, and everybody has all he needs; potatoes are very widely used; nobody is permitted to advance prices of necessities, and it is not being done. Mail comes and goes as regularly as at any other time, and much of it came to us with no exception that it had been opened or examined. The communications are through Scandinavia, Italy and Holland.

"The greatest wonder to me was that wherever one goes in Germany, though knowing that millions of the men are away on the fighting front, there is no observable smaller proportion of men than would be expected. Everywhere I met men who expressed wonderment that they had not been called for yet to go to the front; most of them expected it, and all were ready and enthusiastic about going. But, as I have said, I do not personally believe any of the countries will be willing to sustain another winter campaign.

Germans Coming Here.

"After this war there is going to be a great increase in German intimacy with the United States, and in German travel in this country. There can be no doubt of this. Most Germans of such means as would permit it have traveled in Great Britain; but the feeling toward that country today is such that travel will not be resumed. The United States will get it, and there will be an astonishing volume of it, for the Germans feel exceedingly kindly toward the United States for what this country has done for them.

"I should unhesitatingly say that the dominating, really popular hero in Germany today is the Kaiser. At Christmas time there were great meetings all over the country, and always there would be a speech expressive of loyalty to the fatherland and devotion to the Kaiser; and it would always be the one most fervently cheered.

"Throughout East Prussia, where there is an industrial city or town everywhere you can thrust your head out of the car window to take a look around the factories are running, and it is well-nigh impossible to detect evidence that normal industry has been interfered with. Where materials come, whether the product goes to in ordinary times is sent abroad. I don't know, but I do know that industry seems to be going on normally.

No Dancing Now.

"The country's social life has been very little interfered with; but in this regard I observed everywhere one marked change—there has been no dancing since the war was on. In Berlin the cafes were open, the theaters running as usual, and on my way home I went to the Royal Opera House two or three times to hear the grand opera, and the place was packed every night. "After the war" it is inevitable, I would say, that vast and far-reaching changes will take place—social, economic, political. No matter what side wins, no matter what the terms of peace, I believe every country involved in it will be more greatly changed from within than from without; more changed by the indirect, the social and economic, than by the direct, the military and political effects of the war.

"Let me suggest just one thing in this connection. Before this war the whole World was talking about the persistent increase in the cost of the necessities of life. There were many ventured explanations of it; none that entirely satisfied any great number of victims of the condition. The war came, with all its tremendous wreck of wealth and producing capacity. And with what results? The forces of organized, co-operating society operating through the government have shown that they could keep this advance in cost of living from going ahead at the very time when there was more reason for it than ever before.

Why Go Back?

"People are beginning to say to themselves 'If in such a time as this these results can be accomplished through the rigorous exercise of social power, why can it not be done in time of peace? Why should we go back to the old regime in which, though peace and seeming plenty prevailed, there was no force to prevent increasing prices and unequal distribution which brought poverty to many?'

"The world, I should guess, will never let the pendulum swing all the way back to the old conditions. It is going to learn and to give heed to some great lessons.

Dr. Sanders during his residence in Washington before he went to Germany was chief resident surgeon at Garfield Hospital, and the Misses Hankins and Pitts, who were with his unit in Germany, were also from that institution. Dr. Sanders does not intend to return to the war zone.

Carranzista Agency for Miss Boardman Denies
Food Theft Stories

The following statement of the confidential agency of the provisional government of Mexico was issued today: "Reports were published several days ago crediting Miss Mabel T. Boardman, chairman of the national relief board of the American Red Cross, with a statement that Red Cross supplies sent to the relief of Mexicans in Monterey had been seized by the military authorities there. Upon being informed of these charges, Gen. Raoul Madero, military commander at Monterey, wired Enrique C. Lorente, confidential agent of the provisional government of Mexico, as follows:

"Replying to your message of yesterday, please secure details from Miss Boardman relative to the charges referred to, as I know absolutely nothing about the matter. It is very important that this should be investigated at once, as I am sure a lamentable mistake has been made.

"In accordance with these directions, the confidential agency obtained the following facts: Early in January a serious lack of food in Monterey was reported to the State Department. The American Red Cross undertook to dispatch a relief expedition to Monterey. For this purpose a carload of corn and a carload of rice were purchased. When the supplies reached Laredo, Tex., it was found that on account of the military activity campaign took these dispatches as proof that Villa had definitely launched his aggressive campaign, and was evidently intent on forcing Obregon back to Irapuato, where he would be compelled to retreat toward Pachuca, his midway base between Vera Cruz and his present position, or turn to the west and make his way to the coast via Guadalajara.

Drawn From Main Base.

If the railway between Irapuato and Pachuca has been cut by Zapata, as has been stated in consular advice, and if traffic has been interrupted with Guadalajara by means of the destruction of track and bridges in southwestern Quanahuato, Obregon, military observers point out, may find himself in an embarrassing predicament precisely as the strategy of General Angeles, now with Villa, would be likely to place him.

Experts are disposed to criticize Obregon's tactics in permitting himself to be drawn so far from his main base, with Zapata working in his rear. Besides this they point out that Obregon has been moving by means of troop trains and not by marches, which has necessitated the use of coal and fuel oil, supplies of which cannot be obtained in the country in which he is operating, while Villa has the great commodities of coal and fuel oil as well as the frontier.

The State Department has been advised that David West, representative of President Wilson to Investigate conditions in Mexico, sailed from Vera Cruz yesterday and will reach Washington this week to report on his conference with leaders of the rival Mexican factions.

The course of action which this Government will take in dealing with the diplomatic phases of the Mexican situation will be decided after Mr. West has reported to President Wilson and Secretary Bryan.

Would End Counterfeiting.

The Villa government, it was learned today, has decided to commence a vigorous government in this country to put an end to the counterfeiting of revolutionary currency, which has assumed enormous proportions in Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, and California, in which States the local authorities, it is asserted have exhibited a complete indifference toward stamping out the industry.

Inasmuch as the United States laws do not make it a punishable offense to manufacture and dispose of imitations of the currency of a foreign country, such as the Chihuahua bills, it is said that the counterfeiting have been able to openly carry on their work without restrictions of any sort, while the local authorities in the border States, notwithstanding the laws against forgery and false pretenses, might be applied to those engaged in selling and passing spurious bills, continue simply to wink at the traffic.

Ask If U. S. Is Liable.

According to letters from El Paso recently received in Washington, the inhabitants of the Mexican border states express deep resentment against the American Government as a result of this condition, declaring that it is the duty of the Federal authorities to put an end to a trade so criminal, and which is causing both business men and the poorer classes grave losses, and the aggregate to an enormous sum.

One wealthy Mexican at Chihuahua is known to have made inquiry lately whether the United States Government would not be liable diplomatically under international law for these losses, because of its failure to exercise due diligence in suppressing what, it is alleged, is manifestly a criminal conspiracy against a friendly people.

Precious Gifts Fill
Suffrage Melting Pots

NEW YORK, May 12.—Three big brass jardiniere, filled with rich jewels, silver and gold spoons and trinkets and one silver salad fork, were carried from New York State Suffrage headquarters to a safety deposit vault last night. They were the suffrage "melting pots," and contained the fruits of a six days' campaign. The jewels and the silver and gold trinkets will be sold and the proceeds used in the State campaign for votes for women.

In each of the five boroughs of Greater New York there were suffrage pageants, in Manhattan, scores of automobiles containing suffragists, maneuvered up Fifth avenue past the three big "melting pots," pausing long enough for each occupant to toss in a contribution.

Oregon Man Lands Bride
By Matrimonial "Ad"

WINSTED, Conn., May 2.—Anton Van Schwick, aged thirty-seven, and his bride, Rosa Warren, twenty-two, are speeding across the continent on their way to the bridegroom's sheep ranch in Oregon, following their marriage by the Rev. C. E. Roberts, pastor of St. James' Church. The bride, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Warren, of Farmington, answered a matrimonial advertisement. Eventually photographs were exchanged and the advertiser, Van Schwick, came East a few days ago and met Miss Warren for the first time. The next day they obtained a marriage license.

Van Schwick's ranch is in the wilds of Oregon, which can be reached only on horseback over trails.
